A WELL CONSTRUCTED SCHOOL HOUSE.

In another column in today's issue will be found a description of the new public school building which the city has just erected and which will be dedicated this evening for the purpose of education. In every way it is a notable addition to the collection of buildings for which the citizens of Barre have spent liberally, particularly during the past ten years. They now have nine buildings devoted to school work, and of that number five have been of very recent construction. The models for construction have been steadily gaining in excellence and the Mathewson building thrown open to the public today represents the acme of perfection, if that expression may be used; for it does seem to approach as near perfection of arrangement as possible to make it. To those who gained their book education in the old district school, with its rule, whitened benches, its paper blackboards—if there were any—its lack of sanitary arrangements, and with all its primitive, the new structure reveals a marvellous change. In the same proportion as the old school house lacked the comforts and the conveniences, the new has gained them. And so the older visitors to the Mathewson building will notice. In the course of the construction great care has been taken that the work be done thoroughly and we believe that it was done in the manner in which a private citizen would build his own house, in that the minor details are not overlooked. That this could be done and that the cost of the construction should be less than the lowest contract bid in the lot that were rejected as being too high is a matter of credit to the commissioners who built the school house. When construction work is done by the day better results are generally attained but the price is generally larger. In this case the result of the experiment is that the city has a school house better than would have been put up under contract and that the city has not paid so much within a considerable sum. It will be noticed with what care the arrangements for the prevention of fires have been made. In this respect it is undoubtedly the most fire proof building in the city.
